The Permanent Mission of the United Arab Emirates to the United Nations and the Georgetown Institute for Women, Peace and Security, in partnership with UN Women, are convening a high-level panel discussion to examine the gender dimensions of countering violent extremism (CVE) policy and programming. This panel will offer lessons learned and good practices about integrating a gender dimension into counterterrorism and CVE efforts, as well as recommendations for how these can inform national and multilateral efforts going forward. In light of the Secretary-General’s Plan of Action and the adoption of Security Council Resolution 2242, the panel will share some practical examples of successful initiatives and consider how best gender can be integrated into existing and future research.
